Military planning in isolation historically tends to produce narrow plans prone to worst-case biasing and escalation risks. Risa Brooks demonstrates the importance of information sharing and strategic coordination in her work on civil-military relations and strategic planning.

Democratic, and in particular civilian, control of the armed forces has been a central feature of Lithuanian civilmilitary relations. When Lithuania established its independence, the Supreme Council (the Lithuanian legislative body until when it was superseded by the present-day parliament, the Seimas) in theory exercised control over the Department of National Defence, .
